Photographers now have faster, more accurate adjustments in the largest image RAW converter to date. Adobe Camera Raw (ACR) now includes more than 40 new improvements and enhancements to improve image adjustments for color, exposure, recovery and other features. One of the most talked-about features is the new revamped appearance of the tool palette. The palette now features a lighter, more refined look, with more emphasis on the foreground colors. Plus, the theming options for the tool palette have been expanded to include a new color picker tool, which is now available in the bottom-right corner of the tool palette. Open the Colors > Color panel from the top menu bar and click the color picker tool to bring up an open color tab. After selecting a color, simply drag the cursor around the palette to preview the selected color in different shades. The new Affinity Photo feature allows you to quickly apply multiple filters to an image in a variety of ways. The user experience is very similar to the Mac feature, with each filter type commanding its own set of on-screen buttons, and depending on which filter is active, will change the visual appearance of the active objects in the image. From within the Affinity Photo palette, these filters are available to easily preview and apply in a very similar way to Photoshop. The filters are deep within the effects panel, with the exception of the blur filter, which will be available on the main effects panel. Adobe is also extending the Live Color Picker around the entire document for real-time preview of any color you can see in the document. On a mask, you can use this to narrow down your selection and examine which parts of the image are covered -- duplicating the mask and recomposing it allows you to mix and match with the original where they overlap. See it in action in the video below. To enable the Live Color Picker, click the Live Color Picker button in the color wheel menu.
